Research

We provide expertise and support in the development, design, evaluation and research of technological and media-based educational materials and interventions in health. Areas of research include:

- the design and reuse of open educational resources (OER)
- e-learning self-efficacy and adoption
- participative design and the effectiveness of online healthcare interventions

Helm Open

We have a long-standing global reputation for developing high quality, peer-reviewed multimedia learning resources for healthcare. There are more than 200 of these available as OER on the HelmOpen website. Our resources are being used in more than 40 countries by users ranging from healthcare students and practitioners to the public.

Community

We partner with: academics, students, health service users, carers, families, healthcare professionals, third sector, business and social enterprise. We have an international outlook, working with partners outside of the UK.

HELM has developed a methodology for resource creation that develops shared ownership of the resource content, while ensuring quality control.

Our resources are used in a wide range of settings allowing diverse stakeholder groups within the health arena to share their often unique knowledge and perspectives

Curriculum

HELM support the school in delivering a modern and flexible curriculum, enabling us to offer a range of provision to national and international audiences. Many of our courses use a flipped learning model and we work to sound pedagogical principles. We help support:

- student-centred/personalised learning
- theory-practice integration
- practical needs/issues of large/diverse intakes

Work with us

The University of Nottingham's School of Health Sciences is among the top five schools in the country for Nursing, Midwifery and Physiotherapy.
