SKILLS FORMATION THAT SUPPORTS A JUST TRANSITION

Join us as we unpack: Do skills ecosystems offer useful ideas (or not) to support a just transition?

Just transitions require an approach to skills formation that is strongly place-based and which can play a transformative role in local communities. Furthermore, skills for a just transition need to facilitate distributed agency that is needed across individuals, organisations and systems to drive regime change and work against the lock-ins that hinder structural and systemic change. These policy and practice challenges point to the need to not simply 'match' supply and demand for skills, but also to the need to support educational and occupational progression, social justice, wellbeing, resilience to climate change and sustainability.
