A Lecture by: Professor JRF Gladman

'Dementia - Best Practice with Dignity & Compassion'

John Gladman is Professor in the Medicine of Older People in the University of Nottingham, and also a community geriatrician for Nottingham University Hospital NHS Trust.

His research began in the field of stroke rehabilitation, but in recent years has covered a wide range of topics in the care of older people, using a variety of research methods. He holds several major research leadership roles: he leads the Frail Older People theme of the East Midlands AHSN, and the Caring for Older People and Stroke Survivors theme of CLAHRC East Midlands and is joint Lead of the Interventions to Reduce Musculoskeletal Ageing theme of the Birmingham-Nottingham MRC-ARUK Centre for Musculoskeletal Ageing Research.

His most recent research was the Medical Crises in Older People programme (2008-2013) covering topics including the health care of residents of care homes, the care of frail older people attending acute medical units, and the care of people with dementia and delirium in the general hospital.

He has been publishing research studies since 1990, and has authored over 120 peer reviewed publications, but he has more recently been developing novel approaches to improve the accessibility and value of his research findings. One example of this is "Today is Monday", a short film about the specialist delirium and dementia ward his team set up and evaluated in the Medical Crises in Older People programme.
