Vice-Chancellor's Award for Outstanding Civic Contribution

In July, we reported that University of Nottingham students had scooped a national award for their food distribution work during lockdown. In this short video of thanks, the Foodprint Director, Chris Hyland, explains how they did it

Future Food News

We are delighted to report a sudden rush of innovative new published papers this August from our researchers and collaborators, including:

- Sina Fischer (Nottingham Research Fellow);
- Sally Eldeghaidy (Anne McLaren Research Fellow);
- Guilhem Leyt (Postdoctoral researcher);
- Thomas Alcock (Future Food Beacon Research Fellow);
- Gleb Yakubov (Assistant Professor in Food Composites);
- John Ferguson (Postdoctoral Research Fellow)

Everybody at the Future Food Beacon offers their hearty congratulations on the publication of these important new papers, which are listed in the publications section below.

We further congratulate Sally Eldeghaidy on obtaining a Royal Society international exchange award in partnership with Wageningen University.

If you spend time wondering what is the most sustainable vegetable oil to use, then Thomas Alcock's preliminary investigations into sunflower oil production and greenhouse gas emissions should be of immediate interest. If you missed the in-depth interview with Thomas on May, then you can catch up here

Gabriel Castrillo's return to the lab to urgently continue his work on plant root and soil biome interactions is neatly summarised in this blog from late July.

The 33rd and final edition of the GARNish newsletter throws a spotlight on a great many of our excellent University of Nottingham researchers at pages 16-27. How many do you know?

Finally, if you missed any of June Briefings 2020, then you can still email Gigi Walker to request a recording of any sessions you missed.
